Xiaomi's Mi Max was pretty interesting when it first launched. It was essentially a really big Redmi Note 3 and thanks to its gentle price point, users who wanted huge but reasonably powerful budget phablets had a device they could turn to.

Today, Xiaomi reveals the Mi Max's successor. Simply called the Mi Max 2, the new handset is doubling down on battery life.

The image is a promotional graphic for the Xiaomi Mi Max 2. At the top, the text reads "Mi Max 2" followed by "Big display, bigger battery". Below this, eight circular callouts are arranged in two rows of four. The top row features: "6.44\" large display", "Snapdragon 625 14nm FinFET", "5300mAh Two-day battery", and "4GB + 128GB High memory options". The bottom row features: "Sony IMX386 camera Large 1.25µm pixels", "Stereo sound Auto-switches to stereo in landscape", "Fingerprint sensor", and "IR Blaster Universal remote for TVs and air conditioners". At the bottom of the graphic, a gold-colored Mi Max 2 smartphone is shown from the back, standing upright on a reflective surface. The background consists of large, white, angular geometric shapes. A small text label "Mi Max 2 battery is 5300mAh" is visible in the bottom right corner of the graphic area.

Mi Max 2 battery is 5300mAh

With a 6.44-inch display, 5300mAh battery, 4GB RAM and 128GB of storage, the Mi Max 2 is a true power user's phone. View more details
