The BlackBerry KEYone is tough when it comes to security. However, in terms of durability, it didn't fare too well especially when it involves the most crucial component on a smartphone – the display.

JerryRigAnything had posted a video showing how well does the KEYone stand against some serious abuses. In the first half of the video, it holds up pretty well including scratching of the camera lens and the metal frame. It even recovered from a screen burn test with an actual lighter.

However, when it comes to the popular bend test, the display of the KEYone pops up rather effortlessly. Unlike other phones in the market, it appears that TCL didn't apply any form of adhesive to secure the display in place. If you're not careful, ripping the fragile connector ribbon will then disable the display.
